

Upfront

It's mid-afternoon and we are just back from a highlands hike in Scotland. As advertised, the day featured weather conditions that range the norms for all four seasons.

We waded across more knee-deep streams than I can count with my memory's calculator. In some places, mud the thickness of cake batter swallowed our shoes only to quickly spit them out and send us along our merry way. The six-year-old boy that still resides within me was as euphorically joyful as he was soaking wet.

We broke ahead of our group – Jenna, Sofia, and I – and stopped for a moment in the middle of an emerald mountain valley that stretched up into the clouds in one direction and down to a road below the far-away mist line in the other. We agreed that we were the only three humans in ocular range, and probably well beyond that arbitrary perimeter. At that moment, we fully grasped the magnitude of our shared good fortune: We have the ability, desire, and opportunity to experience such things together. In that same moment, I declared the place we were in to be a representation of God's finest work.

It's difficult to capture the spirit of a place in pictures or words. For the latter, I have no more than a few minutes, as our printing deadline back in the U.S. has arrived. Perhaps the photos on this page, hastily pulled from my phone, hint at the raw and simple majesty of the heather-strewn hills cut through by gurgling streams with water clearer than eyeglass lenses that comprise this part of Scotland. It's a special place, indeed. I don't think my name is an intentional nod to it, but I feel very connected to the land today, nonetheless.
